After pursuing a degree in mass communications, Perino began her career in journalism, working for several local news stations and newspapers. Her exceptional communication skills and understanding of political issues caught the attention of the Republican National Committee, where she served as a spokesperson.

Perino's political career reached new heights when she was appointed White House Press Secretary by President George W. Bush in 2007. As the first female press secretary in the Bush administration, she became a trusted advisor to the president and a respected voice in the White House. Her ability to effectively communicate the administration's policies and respond to media inquiries earned her widespread admiration.

After leaving the White House in 2009, Perino joined Fox News as a political commentator. Her insightful analysis and ability to bridge the gap between different political perspectives have made her a popular figure on the network. She is a regular co-host of "The Five" and "America's Newsroom" and has also hosted her own show, "Dana Perino's Book Club."

In addition to her successful career in journalism, Perino is also an accomplished author. Her memoir, "And the Good News Is...", is a candid and inspiring account of her journey from a small-town girl to becoming one of the most influential women in American politics.

In her memoir, Perino shares her experiences in the White House, her struggles and triumphs as a woman in a male-dominated field, and her personal reflections on faith, family, and friendship.

"And the Good News Is..." has received critical acclaim for its engaging narrative, humor, and insightful perspective on American politics.

Dana Perino is a remarkable woman who has made a significant impact on American politics and media. Through her incisive commentary, her unwavering principles, and her inspiring memoir, she continues to captivate audiences and shape the national conversation.
