How to Write Good Speech Titles

Speech titles are only needed in certain situations. The title of your speech may appear in a printed program, for example, or someone may be introducing your presentation, in which case it's worth investing a little time in making your title as powerful and memorable as possible. If your speech is to be given publicly then its title, if carefully chosen, may bring some people to hear you who otherwise wouldn't come. If you are being introduced by someone, then they will, of course, need to tell the audience the subject of your speech.

Announcing the title is one of the best ways of doing this. A good title may also supplement your introduction by gaining audience interest. Since titles are important in certain situations, let us look at some of the qualities a good title should have. First, the title should indicate the subject of your speech but not reveal it entirely.

People are intrigued by suggestions that leave something to their imaginations. The title, however, should not lead the audience to believe you will speak on one subject when you plan to give a talk on another. Second, the title should be brief and eye-catching. Titles that can be read at a glance are much more effective than long ones.

It is safe to say that the longer the title, the fewer people will read it. Long speech titles defeat the very purpose for which they are intended. Thus, speech titles should be original, if possible. Overworked titles scream BORING and the quickest way to encourage your audience to switch off before you've even got started.

Titles may take many forms. Variations include a quotation, a question, a paradoxical statement, or a shocking statement. Whatever speech title you pick, it must serve the purpose of attracting attention to your presentation. If there will be no opportunity to use a title, or to have it announced, don't waste time developing one.

It actually works against you to announce the title of a speech if it isn't necessary. Here are some examples of effective titles:

- Run, Don't Walk, to the Nearest Exit (for a speech on the need for atomic energy control)
- The Ominous Cloud (for a speech on Russian foreign policy)
- I Stutter (for a speech on stuttering and how it can be controlled)
- That's Why the Lady Is a Champ (for a speech on a female tennis champion)
