Pow's journey began in the bustling metropolis of Hong Kong, where he lived a comfortable life with his family. However, everything changed with the outbreak of war. In December 1941, Japanese forces invaded Hong Kong, plunging the city into chaos and despair.

Pow's family was torn apart by the conflict. His father was killed in the fighting, while his mother and siblings were taken prisoner. Pow himself was separated from his family and forced into labor by the Japanese occupiers.

For the next three years, Pow endured unimaginable hardships. He was subjected to backbreaking labor, starvation, and beatings. Despite the constant threat of death, Pow never gave up hope. He clung to the belief that one day he would be free.

In 1945, with the war finally drawing to a close, Pow and a group of fellow prisoners escaped from their Japanese captors. They made their way through the dense jungles of Hong Kong and eventually reached safety.
