The Formative Years

Walt Disney's early life was marked by both challenges and opportunities. Born in 1901 in Chicago, Illinois, he was the fourth of five children. His father, Elias Disney, was a carpenter and farmer, while his mother, Flora Call Disney, was a homemaker. The family struggled financially, and Walt often had to work odd jobs to help support his family.

Despite the hardships, Walt's childhood was filled with creativity and imagination. He loved to draw and paint, and he spent countless hours creating his own comic strips and cartoons. He also had a passion for animals, and he often brought home stray cats and dogs to care for.

The Move to Kansas City

In 1911, the Disney family moved to Kansas City, Missouri. Walt was 10 years old at the time, and the move had a profound impact on his life. Kansas City was a major center for the arts and entertainment industry, and Walt was exposed to a wide variety of new influences that would later shape his work.

Walt attended the Kansas City Art Institute, where he studied drawing and painting. He also began working as a commercial artist, creating ads and illustrations for local businesses. It was during this time that he met Ub Iwerks, a fellow artist who would become his lifelong friend and collaborator.

The Birth of Animation

In 1920, Walt Disney and Ub Iwerks founded the Laugh-O-Gram Studio, their first animation company. The studio produced a series of short animated films, but it ultimately went bankrupt. Undeterred, Walt moved to Hollywood in 1923 and founded the Disney Brothers Cartoon Studio, which would later become the Walt Disney Company.

Walt Disney's early animated films were simple and straightforward, but they quickly gained popularity for their humor and charm. In 1928, Walt created Mickey Mouse, a character that would become one of the most recognizable and beloved figures in the world.
